| 15 | Up to two marks for understanding how conditional positive regard may affect self-esteem.For example:• Conditional positive regard is when an individual is shown love and support only when they meet certain conditions such as achieving good marks in a test (1). This may affect self-esteem as individuals are constantly under pressure to meet these conditions leading to insecurity and self-doubt (1).• Conditional positive regard is where an individual is only valued when certain standards or expectations are met (1). This may lead to lower self-esteem as the individuals are constantly worried that they are not good enough leading to low self-worth (1).Accept any other appropriate response. | (2) |

| 19 | AO1 = 3 marks; AO2 = 3 marks; AO3 = 3 marksMarkers must apply the descriptors in line with the general marking guidance (on pages 2–3).Due to the intrinsic links between the skills, if a response evidences performance against only one trait/skill it will be for demonstrating knowledge and understanding. An answer displaying qualities of AO1 only, cannot be awarded more than the top of Level 1, no matter how strong the performance is in AO1.AO1• Unconditional positive regard is when praise or affection is given to a person without restrictions or requirements on their behaviour.• Conditional positive regard is when praise or affection is given based on meeting certain conditions imposed on the person by someone else.• Conditions of worth develop when individuals internalise other people's ideas about who they should be over their own.AO2• Wilbur's parents tell him they are proud of him for trying his best rather than how well he does at the tasks and activities that he tries.• Oliver's parents tell him they are proud of his achievements, so he is less confident with new things in case he does not achieve well.• Oliver has conditions based on achievement determining his worth which may be why he wants to be a Doctor to impress his Dad.AO3• Rogers (1959) suggested that affection without conditions from significant others could lead to Wilbur's higher self-esteem and confidence, which can explain why he continues to try his best.• Conditional positive regard could result in Oliver's dependency on external praise to build his self-esteem, as Rogers (1959) claimed that self-concept is based on the standards of others.• Oliver may want to be a Doctor as a result of observing his Dad at work and being motivated to achieve the same rewards, so positive regard may not fully explain all of Oliver's behaviours. | (9) |
