40 Tyler is a lecturer at Dunarvon University. He is hoping to arrange a meeting with Zhang, a newly appointed lecturer who has recently arrived in the country.

Tyler emails Zhang suggesting a meeting at three in the afternoon. He tells Zhang that he is happy to move the meeting forwards or backwards if this time is not convenient. Zhang replies that he would like the meeting to be moved above three in the afternoon if possible. Tyler is confused about what time Zhang wants the meeting to take place.

Assess how well linguistic relativism can account for Tyler's lack of understanding about what time to arrange the meeting for.

42 Mary visited a remote tribe that had no known words for different numbers. She wanted to test whether they were able to count or distinguish between amounts when they had no language to formally determine these concepts.

Mary found that the tribe could distinguish between having 'more' or 'less' of an item. She found they could verbalise when there were 'few' or 'many' items. However, they were unable to distinguish any differences in amount when the amounts were similar, such as 17 and 18 items.

Assess how well linguistic determinism can explain the tribe's understanding of the concept of numbers.

40 Naadir lives in a remote tribal community where there is limited technology. A visitor from a large city came to the community and brought a laptop computer. When the visitor asked Naadir where she could go to connect her laptop to the internet, Naadir did not understand what the visitor meant.

The visitor showed Naadir the laptop, which Naadir called a television. When the visitor was typing on the keyboard of the laptop, she showed Naadir how the words would then appear on screen. Naadir responded by saying how the remote control for the television was very advanced. He later told his friends about the special television that came from the city.

Assess how well linguistic determinism can explain why Naadir talks about the laptop as a television.

41 Moki has decided to learn English as his second language. He started online lessons with an English tutor. Moki is struggling with his learning because there are big differences between his native language and the English language.

Moki is currently learning words for rain, such as heavy, light, shower and downpour. He can say the words but does not understand why there are so many words for rain when his language only has one word.

The tutor shows Moki video clips and pictures of different types of rain alongside each word, and he is beginning to understand the differences between these types of rain.

Assess how well linguistic determinism can explain Moki's difficulty learning a second language.
